

I knew what to say. I knew what to do.

“As an elementary school teacher, I care about my students – but it can be hard to know what to do when children appear to be struggling. Between a busy schedule, not knowing what to say, or even not feeling sure of warning signs, it can be a challenge. But I learned what to say, and I learned what to do. So can you.”

Youth mental health issues are very real. When I noticed that a child in my class was beginning to change, I was concerned. I observed his negative behaviour and attitude, and it wasn't getting any better. Then he started making negative comments about himself, and even acting out in class. I knew that I needed to do something.

By learning about resources in our community, and fostering a healthy relationship with my students and their parents, I felt confident to open up a conversation with this student – and I am so glad that I did. I understand that it's not my job to solve all of his problems, but I know I did the right thing by connecting him with the support that he needed. I didn't need to say the perfect thing; I just needed to start the conversation. Now I feel equipped to do the same for other students.

Learn what to say. Learn what to do.
